"A Bluejacket's Honor"

BOB LAWRENCE, chief gunner on the Frederick, receives a mysterious note asking him to be at a rendezvous to hear something of benefit to him. Bob goes.

Cassolonian revolutionists offer him an enormous sum to ship with them and man their guns when they attack Cassolonia. Bob refuses to be false to his oath of allegiance to Uncle Sam. Finding he is not to be bribed they threaten him with death and make him a prisoner. He frees himself, uses the rags, and wig-wags a signal of distress to his ship.

The captain sends officers and men to Bob's rescue. Bob has been detected signaling. The revolutionists attack, overpower and again make him a prisoner. Then they flee. Bob escapes from the den and later radios the Frederick and tells the captain the revolutionists are planning escape to the high seas. The captain orders the Frederick under way. Bob follows the revolutionists' ship in a fast water gig.

He gets aboard, battles the insurrectionists, holds the ship, and the Frederick following fires her big guns at it. The boat and the revolutionist crew are captured. Bob is publicly commended for his bravery by the U. S. Government.
